

Constitutional Soup

The old saying goes that if a frog begins a journey in cold water and as the heat rises, death will unknowingly occur, however if the water has become heated, the frog entering heated water will jump for survival.

This writer has never touched the United States Constitution but such lack of touch does not mean the words are not to be. Similar, this writer has never touched the stone(s) that carries the Ten Commandments, but the lack of touch does not mean the words are not to be.

Similarly, occurrences currently taking place throughout the world are all too visual to not be ignored. For most of history, population grew at near 3 percent. Logic also provides that creation of money needs to be injected at near the same percentage for the world to grow and prosper efficiently.

In turning attention to the Central Banks of the world, the continuous introduction of money is without tangible backing of the people. With a slow-down in the growth of world population industrial output was certain to reach a level of market saturation. As saturation was reached and with lack of tangible money in the hands of the people the power to purchase product is lost. There is another factor to the equation that is even more damning than the two already mentioned, the accelerated rate of intangible value. Most of the big banks and many of the special investment houses depend upon the numbers returned in this intangible market. A serious question has to be asked in regards to the intangible market, was intent for the intangible market to reach a level of value and utilizing scare tactics was one day the value to be great enough to absolve the need for tangible money? If such is true, then the power of the governments to print and inject monetary value into a countries economy has become obsolete, not to mention the world's economy. At this point the central banks of the world would no longer be needed but the question to be asked, have the central banks of the world not realized they are just an ingredient (method and means) or is it they are just as dumb as the frog that began his final hours in the boiling pot.

Financial leaders in fashion cannot touch the reality of the circumstances but they believe in the words spoken to them by those that would if allowed place the world deeper into servitude.

Millions if not billions of people are asking what is it that the leaders will do for their country, for if these frog headed leaders keep on with their soup minded ways, the people should and will hopefully act appropriately.

Maybe the crimes against humanity no longer take tangible form and form that Hitler used, but the intangible crimes being committed would in this writer's opinion make Hitler look like a choir boy.

Ask not what your country can do for you. The lack of action of elected leaders have place the people into a position that justice is demanded which was granted by God and guaranteed by the United States Constitution.

Are the people looking at a Reps and Warrant violation, elections forthcoming, trial and error and there have so far been too many errors.
